

Filling the Library

What dog owners actually struggle with, what the six proposed titles miss, and a second angle worth its own funnel.

THE GAP

The six proposed titles miss the number-one problem

Dental, Flat-Face, Enrichment, Nutrition, Puppy's First 90 Days, Senior — all care and health. Every large demand signal points somewhere else: behaviour.

Bark Busters' 2026 US analysis, built from nearly 50,000 in-home training consultation inquiries, found reactivity topping the list, followed by excessive barking, separation anxiety, leash-walking and household manners. A separate survey of 600 US owners had 61% naming separation anxiety as their single biggest behavioural concern, with 72% at least somewhat worried about their dog's stress when alone.

Separation anxiety isn't in the bundle at all

The most-cited concern in the niche, and no guide for it. Meanwhile Decode Your Dog teaches people to read distress signals — which leaves the reader wanting exactly this. That's a bundle title that sells itself off the free product.

THE BIGGER INSIGHT

Not all six should be guides

What consistently sells in the pet digital category isn't ebooks — it's fill-in printables.

Reporting on top Etsy digital categories for 2026 lists pet health records, care planners, walking trackers, sitter instructions, vaccination records and budget trackers as a category in their own right, with the explicit advice to bundle health records, a grooming log and a vet visit tracker together.

Why this matters for the price

Eight PDFs of prose at $27–30 invites the thought “that's a lot of reading.” A library—guides plus fill-in trackers plus the fridge cards — feels like a kit you'll use, not homework. Same effort, better perceived value, and printables are the cheapest things in the set to make. The free guides already proved it: the quick-reference card is the piece people keep.

CANDIDATES, RANKED

What to add, in what order

1

The Home Alone Guide — separation anxiety

Biggest gap, biggest demand signal. What alone-time distress actually looks like, boredom versus genuine distress, departure routines, and when it stops being a training problem.

Ship in v1. Bridges straight from Decode Your Dog.

2

The Coco Paperwork Pack — printables, not prose

Vaccination and health record, vet visit log, medication schedule, grooming log, dog-sitter handover sheet, emergency contact card. Fill-in, print-ready, one design.

Ship in v1. Fastest to produce, and the sitter sheet gets shared — free distribution.

3

He's Not Aggressive, He's Scared — reactivity

The most-cited training inquiry, and the framing is the hook: lunging, barking at strangers and growling when startled usually read as aggression when they're fear or frustration.

Relieving to an owner who thinks they have a dangerous dog.

Strong, but needs careful scoping — see the liability note.

4

The First 30 Days — rescue and rehome

Rescue dogs are flagged as significant demand nationwide. Puppy's First 90 Days covers one arrival; this covers the adopter, taking on an adult dog with no history.

Complements rather than overlaps.

5

The Walk — leash pulling and manners

Both rank top five. Practical, uncontroversial, and the easiest behaviour guide to write safely.

Safe, real demand. Third wave.

Barking also ranks top five but overlaps heavily with both #1 and #3 — fold it in as a chapter rather than writing it separately. End-of-life and memorial content sells in this category and the Senior guide already carries the highest willingness to spend, but keep it out of v1: grief content written carelessly reads as exploitative, and this is a brand fronted by a living dog. If it ships, make it a companion to Senior, not a standalone with its own ad.

Reactivity carries bite liability

A step up from the vet-bill exposure. A paid guide reading as a handling protocol for a dog that lunges and growls, followed by someone getting bitten, is a materially worse position than one discussing dental costs. Scope it as understanding and de-escalation, never a training programme. State plainly that any bite history or bite risk goes to a qualified behaviourist. Never imply it resolves anything.

Separation anxiety is a diagnosis

Clinical prevalence sits far below what owners self-report, so a chunk of readers have a bored dog and some have one who needs a vet. The guide helps people tell the difference and stops there. No diagnosis, no medication discussion, no promises. One circulating figure claims 85.9% of US dogs show moderate-to-severe separation anxiety — the paper's own authors call it an overstatement. Keep it out of ad copy; the 61% figure is properly sourced.

Recommendation: Home Alone and the Paperwork Pack go first

Paul's brief asks which two and why. One closes the largest demand gap in the niche and reads as the sequel to Decode Your Dog; the other is the cheapest thing here to build and does the most to justify calling it a library. The rest follows once traffic shows which psychology the audience responds to.

Want Your Dog to Earn Too?

A separate page and product line teaching owners to turn a pet account into something real. Worth doing — with one repositioning.

THE CASE FOR IT

Better economics than the care guides, and Coco is unusually well placed to sell it.

Collabstr's live rate data puts the average animals-and-pets sponsored post at $170 in 2026. Guidance for Instagram pet creators runs $50–$200 per post at 1K–10K followers, with video at $100–$300. Two details matter more than the headline: dog and cat accounts see 2–4x higher engagement than lifestyle creators, and pet insurance and veterinary brands are newer to influencer marketing with more flexible budgets — an underexplored sponsor category.

Relevant to Coco specifically: breed-specific creators, where someone is one of a small number covering a particular breed, command a premium over standard ranges. Coco is a Frenchie with a year-old account and real organic reach. That's the credential. And a business buyer pays differently — care guides live at $12–30, a creator toolkit sits at $47–97 without argument.

THE HONEST PROBLEMS

1. A different audience, not a cross-sell

Someone who just downloaded a guide about what their dog's ears mean is not, in that moment, an aspiring creator. Care-reader to business-buyer will convert poorly, and running both through one nurture hurts both. In tag terms this is a second parent audience, exactly like Homeowners — own funnel, own list, never merged.

2. Income claims are regulated

"Make money from your dog" is earnings-claim territory, where the substantiation bar is high. Meaningfully higher risk than anything in the pet-care line, and the kind of exposure that arrives as a complaint rather than a warning.

3. Coco hasn't been monetised yet THE REAL ONE

This is the objection to answer before anything gets built. We'd be selling a guide on turning a pet account into income while Coco's own account hasn't done that.

Someone will ask, and they'll be right to. It's also the strongest asset once it is true — every number becomes a screenshot. Building this after Coco has results is a much better business than building it now.

THE REPOSITIONING

Sell the system, not the income

All three problems shrink if the product teaches how to run a pet account like a brand rather than promising earnings.

Same competence, same buyer, nothing to substantiate, and it's honest today — because building the brand is exactly what we are demonstrably doing. It also matches what sells: this category rewards templates and toolkits over prose.

What's in it

- Media kit template — the document brands ask for
- Rate card framework, with the ranges above as reference
- Brand pitch scripts and follow-ups
- Usage-rights explainer — never granted by default, always a separate negotiation, and where new creators get taken advantage of
- Content system: repeatable formats, posting rhythm, hook structure
- The affiliate and creator programmes worth applying to

How to test it cheaply

Don't build the product. Build the page. One landing page, one capture, one honest promise — “the system we're using to build Coco, as we build it” — and a small spend against creator-adjacent targeting.

Respectable opt-in rate, build it. Otherwise we've spent a page and a day rather than six guides. The infrastructure is already there: sub-account, workflows and funnel pattern all reuse, with only a new tag tree.

My recommendation

Yes to the angle — positioned as a brand-building system rather than an income promise, built as a separate parent audience with its own page and list, and validated with a capture page before anyone writes a guide. Not this week. Coco's Week 1 has a Friday deadline and three people on it, and this is the kind of good idea that quietly eats a launch.

On your reference link: `aleyandluna.netlify.app/s` returns a 404 and the root isn't indexed, so I couldn't see it. Send a screenshot or a working URL and I'll fold the layout into the page spec.